REARING YOUNG CALVES BY HAND,-The demand for milk being great at all seasons, the necessity often arises for weaning calves when only a few days old. The practice is wrong, but we must make the best of it and endeavor to feed the calves in such manner as to keep them in health. A good substitute for milk is bean soup, made thin enough to drink, to which has been added corn meal and a small proportion of salt. If it is possible to add milk to the bean soup it will be much better for the calf. Occasionally the diet should be changed by making a strong infusion or decoction of clover or other hay, which is prepared by running the clover through a cutter and steeping it in water for a few hours. This decoction should be salted a little, and have added to it fine bran or shipstuff. It is essential in feeding young calves to change the food as much as possible, and always see that it is of a nourishing quality. Beans are the best substitute for milk, but milk is better than anything else. One thing should not be overlooked, however, which is that there is but little to gain from a calf when improperly cared for in its earlier days.
